

GEN. DE QUESADA DEAD.
The Cuban Patriot Succumbs as the Result of a Surgical Operation.

The Cuban General Rafael de Quesada died at the Hotel Endicott on Friday night. He arrived in this country from Cuba about a week ago, and it was understood in Cuban circles that he would be intrusted with the command of one of the first of the expeditions which are now being fitted out to aid the patriot army. On Monday he had an operation performed on his throat, and it appears that the disease was of a more serious nature than his medical attendant had supposed, for the General always referred lightly to the subject, and submitted to the operation with the belief that it would cause him but a trifling annoyance. On the contrary, however, the General's condition became alarming soon after the operation, and he continued to grow worse until on Friday, when it became apparent that a fatal result was at hand.

Gen. de Quesada was born in the city of Puerto Principe in 1836. At the outbreak of the revolution in October, 1868, he was a Colonel in the regular army, and having obtained an indefinite leave of absence, he joined the Cuban patriot army, and soon distinguished himself as a man of great courage and ability.

By special appointment of President Caspedes, who was his brother-in-law, he went to Mexico, where he organized a Cuban regiment for the island, and in May, 1869, became the steamer Salvador, an expedition composed of 129 men, all belonging to the most prominent Cuban families. After the fall of the Cuban rebellion, he made his escape from Cuba to Jamaica, a distance of over one hundred miles, on board a cayuco, a primitive kind of boat, which he had built himself, and, having secured a passage, he took a second large expedition, which he took to Cuba in June, 1871, on board the steamer Irigoyen, and was captured by the Spaniards some time afterward. In July, 1873, he landed a third expedition.

Gen. de Quesada never accepted the peace signed at El Zanjon in 1873. He then went to Mexico and after travelling through different empires, finally established himself in Veracruz, where he engaged in considerable agricultural interests, and was greatly distinguished by Gen. Crespo, the President of the republic, who admitted him into the national army with the same rank he had in that of Cuba.

Obituary Notes.

Intelligence reached Williamsburgh yesterday from Zeila, Africa, of the death on May 23 of David Macdonald Reoch, who went abroad as a missionary in March, 1889, under the auspices of the American Foreign Missions' Association. In early life he entered the Brooklyn Training School for Christian workers, and he died recently at the New York Seminary. Before graduation he went abroad on missionary work. He first went to Arabia, His widowed mother still lives in Williamsburgh.
